PART I: ACCESS TO INFORMATION FROM WRITTEN TEXTS (60 points)

Read the article below and then answer questions 1-8.

ROBOTS IN HEALTHCARE

I When Moxi the robot arrived at a hospital in Texas two years ago, it didn't get a very warm welcome. The nurses didn't think it would be much help to them, and they were sure patients would not like having a robot around. However, the patients were fascinated, and the nurses soon discovered that Moxi could take over a lot of their boring jobs, such as getting medical supplies, taking blood samples to the laboratory, and bringing medicines from the pharmacy. These errands normally take up about a third of a nurse's day, but with Moxi to help them, the nurses could spend the extra time looking after patients.

II Moxi has a flexible mechanical arm that can pick up anything from a piece of paper to a heavy bottle. Its designers also gave it human-like features — the height of an average person, a round white head, and two small eye-shaped lights that seem to blink as it glides toward you. And indeed, doctors, nurses and patients all treat Moxi as a member of the staff. "We actually talk to it," laughs Gordon Brown, a nurse at the hospital. "Not that we get an answer, but who knows, maybe in the future we will."

III While healthcare robots like Moxi do relatively simple jobs, others are taking on far more complex tasks in hospitals. One highly sophisticated model, called da Vinci, has been designed for use in operating rooms, where it helps surgeons do the precise and delicate work involved in surgery. Since the da Vinci first appeared on the market, it has been used in over two million operations worldwide. "It's not easy to get used to doing an operation this way — sitting at a computer screen and controlling a robot that's using the surgical instruments," says Dr. Barbara Stanton, a surgeon at a London hospital. "But we can now do complicated procedures we couldn't do before. My colleagues and I have also found that we get a lot less exhausted, and can work much more efficiently."

IV Of course, there are also people who need care at home. For them, human-like robots are becoming available that can provide such services as heating up a meal, giving medicine, and checking temperature and blood pressure. Perhaps most importantly for those living alone, the robots are capable of holding simple conversations. These innovations are being led by Japan — a country with the world's highest percentage of elderly people in need of care.

V Elsewhere, such solutions have been met with concern. "Healthcare robots could cost human caregivers their jobs," says sociologist Kevin Wallace. "Even worse, the sick and the elderly, who need human contact the most, would be getting much less of it. Moreover, the purchase price of these robots is likely to be extremely high." Nevertheless, Wallace believes that robots will eventually be introduced at every stage of healthcare. "After all, those already on the market have proved to be incredibly reliable and efficient," he explains. "Given the need to provide care for an increasingly ageing population, the advantages will clearly outweigh the disadvantages."

QUESTIONS (60 points)
